
September Corporate Email Copy

Meji Media corporate push, for your sign-off. Prepared 2026-07-29.

Awards-led, as you set the direction: your two flagship events are awards nights, so the copy opens on the reader's own awards evening and works outward from there. Three versions, three touches each over about two weeks, every touch adding something new. Nothing sends until you approve.

The one change from the version you approved in July: the decision-maker emails now lead on the outcome (the night lands well, zero load on their team) instead of the 30% savings line. Testing and reply patterns say senior people respond to the outcome, and a percentage claim reads like a mass mailer. If you would rather keep the savings line, it goes straight back in.

Personalisation, stated plainly: the broadcast emails (A and B) merge each reader's city and the awards occasion. Naming a specific venue per reader only happens in Version C, the named-accounts track, where each company gets a few minutes of research first. That is what the data supports UK-wide; we would rather under-promise here than send something generic dressed up as personal.

Version A: Decision-makers (Head of People / HR Director / Head of Events)

Email 1

Subject: your awards night this year

Hi [First name],

I run corporate awards nights and staff celebrations end to end, from 10-person team days to 350-guest ceremonies. Two recent ones: Polestar's 350-person end-of-year awards night, and the Sports Journalists' Awards at the London Palladium, which the client called "worthy of a West End production."

When the awards evening lands well it's the thing people talk about for months, and it usually lands on someone's desk to make happen. I take that whole side off your team: venue, production, run of show, one point of contact, nothing falls through.

If you've got an awards night or a staff celebration coming up this year, even loosely, want me to send over a couple of worked examples? A one-word yes is enough, no call needed unless you'd prefer one.

Cheers, Gurmej

Email 2 (3-4 business days later, same thread)

Hey [First name], one example of the standard I hold these to.

The Sports Journalists' Awards at the London Palladium: full production, run of show, managed on the night. Same standard whether it's a 350-guest ceremony or a 20-person team evening.

If there's anything on your calendar this year, awards or otherwise, I'd like the chance to put a couple of options in front of you. Even a rough "we usually do something around [month]" is enough to start.

Gurmej

Email 3 (7-10 days later, same thread)

Hey [First name], last one from me on this.

If your events this year are already covered, no problem at all. If it would help, I can send a short write-up of the Polestar awards night so it's on file for next time.

And if this sits with someone else on your side, just point me their way and I'll take it from there.

Either way, thanks for reading. Gurmej

Version B: Organisers (PA / EA / Office Manager / HR coordinator)

Email 1

Subject: for when the awards night lands on your desk

Hi [First name],

I produce corporate awards nights and staff events for companies like Polestar and a top 5 UK accountancy firm, from small team days to 350-guest ceremonies. Usually it's the person keeping everything running who ends up organising these, so I wanted to reach you directly.

I take the whole operational side off your plate: venue, suppliers, run of show, on the night. One point of contact, and nothing falls through.

If there's an awards evening or a celebration coming up this year, send me a rough idea of numbers and timing and I'll put a couple of options together you can take to the team. Happy to jump on a quick call instead, whichever is easier.

Cheers, Gurmej Meji Corporate Events

Email 2 (1-2 days later, same thread)

Hey [First name], just bringing this back up.

If events are part of your remit, I can take the legwork out: fully managed, one point of contact throughout, nothing falls through. For Polestar that's their 350-person awards night, start to finish.

Even a rough "we usually do something around [month]" is enough for me to send a couple of options.

Gurmej Meji Corporate Events

Email 3 (7-10 days later, same thread)

Hey [First name], last one from me.

If it's all in hand this year, no worries at all. If awards nights or staff events aren't your area, just point me to whoever picks these up and I'll take it off your desk.

Thanks for reading either way. Gurmej Meji Corporate Events

Version C: Named accounts (the multi-event companies)

For the 5-10 big corporates that run several events a year: fewer sends, longer sequence, positioned as one contact across their whole events calendar. Every first email opens with a line specific to that company (their own awards night, a staff-event post, a new Head of People), which is why this track gets individual research and the broadcast tracks do not. We build the target list together before any of these go out.

Email 1

Subject: your events calendar this year

Hi [First name],

[Company-specific opening line, written per account. E.g. "Saw the photos from your awards night on LinkedIn."]

I run corporate events end to end for companies like Polestar and a top 5 UK accountancy firm. For Polestar that's their annual end-of-year awards night: 350 people, bespoke awards ceremony, live entertainment, full production. They've come back year on year.

Where I add the most is when there's more than one event in the year: one point of contact across all of them, full accountability, start to finish.

If there's an event on your calendar this year, pick the nearest one and I'll show you how I'd handle it. Even a one-line reply is enough.

Cheers, Gurmej

Email 2 (4-5 business days later, same thread)

Hey [First name], one example of the standard I hold events to.

The Sports Journalists' Awards at the London Palladium: full production, run of show, managed on the night. The client called it "worthy of a West End production."

Same standard whether it's a 10-person team day or a 350-guest ceremony. If there's anything on your calendar this year, I'd like the chance to quote for it, and I can send a short write-up of a past night so you can see the detail.

Gurmej

Email 3 (10-14 days later, same thread)

Hey [First name], last one from me.

If your events are already covered this year, no problem at all. Next time one comes around I'd welcome the chance to be measured against whoever you use now, on the same brief.

Either way, thanks for reading. Gurmej

After your sign-off

The copy loads into the paused corporate campaigns and holds for the September window. Fresh contact lists get built just before launch so the data is current, with the usual checks (your past customers excluded, addresses verified). Replies stay yours, same day; the daily flag makes sure nothing sits.

If anything above reads off, say the word and it changes. Otherwise a simple "approved" is all that is needed.